Dirk van der Kley

China is opening its markets to Central Asia's fledgling food exporters, embarking on a new phase of economic engagement with the region.

For decades, China had an appetite for Central Asian oil and gas and a few commodities, but little else. Beijing is now encouraging more industries to send it their goods. It has signed phytosanitary agreements □ approving a growing range of Central Asian foodstuffs □ while helping firms secure export licenses and learn the ins and outs of Chinese e-commerce.
