The brewing competition between the U.S. and China is the defining conflict of the 21st century. The White Houses recent Interim National Security Strategic Guidance Document, crafted to convey President Bidens vision for how America will engage with the world, is all about the U.S. vs. China. Yet it fails to mention the region where America has its lightest footprint on the planet: Central Asia.

China is building a land bridge to Europe and the Middle East that runs through Central Asia. The new administration will have to account for the region in its strategic thinking if it hopes to re-engage the world after four years of President Trumps America First policy.
